WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION:

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

A significant warming and drying trend is now underway as Pacific high pressure gradually builds across Northern California. Increasing northwest to northeast winds will also bring additional warming and drying from the Sierra and Cascade crest westwards towards the coast with offshore flow. Strongest northeast and offshore winds will be late this afternoon across the Sacramento Valley, then late tonight into Thursday morning across the Western Sierra and Cascades. Into the Coastal range including the Bay area, winds in these regions could gust over 40 mph. In addition poor relative humidity recoveries are likely as well. Light offshore flow gradually weakens by Friday. Light and variable winds for the weekend into early next week. Forecast uncertainties hinge on a possible upper low approaching the California coast. There is a chance of cooler conditions with higher humidity by early next week with isolated showers or thunderstorms across the mountains.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

Surface high pressure over the Great Basin will bring north to east winds of 15 to 25 mph with gusts to 40 mph to the mountains and below the canyons and passes of Southern California as well as to the Owens Valley and Colorado River through early Thursday afternoon. High pressure aloft centered off the California Coast will bring a slow warming trend along with widespread minimum humidity in the single digits and teens to the region through Friday. Maximum temperatures will be in the 50s to low 60s across the mountains and in the mid 70s to mid 80s in the valleys today. The high pressure aloft will move off to the south and west as an area of low pressure forms and deepens off the California Coast Saturday through early next week. This low pressure area will bring a cooling trend and an increase in humidity to the region. Temperatures will become near to below normal by early next week. The low will also bring daily isolated to scattered afternoon showers and thunderstorms to the Sierra Saturday through early next week.
